2°: Paris Negotiations for an Urgent Halt to Global Warming”

For the first time in over 20 years of UN negotiations, the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC), Conference of the Parties (COP21) in Paris aims to reach a binding, universal agreement among all nations on climate. The overarching goal of the convention, which will take place in November and December, is to reduce greenhouse gas emissions to limit global temperature increase to 2 degrees Celsius above pre-industrial levels. During previous rounds of talks, participating nations have agreed to outline national contributions they intend to take by March 2015.

While all parties involved agree on the necessity of a universal agreement, there is still disagreement about how to differentiate between obligations for states at various developmental stages, about the weight of adaptation in the agreement as well as about the controllability and bindingness of national contributions.

Egypt, leading the Arab Group and chairing this years' African Ministerial Conference on the Environment (AMCEN) will play a crucial role during the negotiations, while suffering disproportionately and already perceptibly from the consequences of climate change.

The 30th Cairo Climate Talks, “2°: Paris Negotiations for an Urgent Halt to Global Warming”, will bring together local and foreign experts to assess the goals and challenges of COP21 by discussing the status quo of the respective national contributions and by contributing to a rapprochement concerning the unsolved issues.
